During the past several years I have followed the government/Microsoft case. The competitors of Microsoft applied their pressure and, in my opinion, the situation turned from legal to a political situation.

The Attorney Generals, representing their respective states and constituents (competitors of Microsoft) have set forth the claim that the consumer has been hurt by the activities of Microsoft. Yet, I, as a consumer, would love to know what damage has been caused to me so that I would be able to compare it to the financial damage caused by the shadows this case has cast over the financial market

The AG's pursue their ultimate desire which, in my opinion, would ultimately satisfy the companies they have in their respective States while the investors and the market continue being the victim. Moreover, the economy of our nation has diminished in proportion to the overall effect that the market has suffered.

My wife and I have made investments in Microsoft, Aol, Sun, Cisco etc., hoping to build a future financial support for our Great-grand-children when it would be needed for their college education. There is no doubt in my mind that numerous other parents and grand-parents have invested with the same thought in mind. And, as long as the uncertainty overshadows the market the multitude of persons invested in the technology stocks will continue suffering the financial loss that the case continues to create by causing ongoing legal demands, by the AG's, that surpass the final determination of the federal government.

The federal government and several States have reached a comprehensive agreement with Microsoft. Why therefore should the marketplace and the consumers be held hostage to the will of competitors and the remaining attorney generals who insist upon additional legal demands. Neither the consumers nor the overall economy needs further uncertainty

It is time to put this matter to rest.

Very truly yours,

Daniel Miller
